A Confession of a Teenage Blockhead

I love this play. It's funny, creative and poignant; just like it's source material. While it's about high school kids in a literal sense, I believe the message is universal. Acceptance, not judging things that might frighten us. These are traits we all should embrace. However, societal "norms" and social structures, can often make it difficult. Difficult, but not impossible. But many times, it is the simplest, most basic lessons of our lives that are also the most easily forgotten; but it can be something as simple as a letter from our pen pal, that remind us of those simple, most important things that make us who we are, as well as the choices that collectively define us.
